** Towards the end of the semester, it might be helpful to have a Latin dictionary. The Langenscheidt Pocket Latin Dictionary (ISBN-13: 978-0887291074) is very good, but you may use whatever you like. If you plan to continue with Latin past this semester, you might also consider ordering one of the big lexicons: either the Oxford Latin Dictionary, or, the older Oxford "Lewis and Short" Latin Dictionary. These dictionaries are available for use in the Classics department library.

Course objectives:

This semester, we will be completing the Wheelock textbook. Also, throughout the semester (and, especially in the last three weeks), we will begin reading extended passages of Latin authors: we will decide as a class what we want to try together (I have suggested two texts above, in addition to Wheelock). The challenge this semester will be to consolidate everything we covered last year, to recall and continue to build vocabulary, and also to prepare ourselves for some complex grammar (including uses of the “subjunctive mood,” such as conditional statements).

Your grade will be based on three exams (each 20%), assignments and Wednesday quizzes (30 %), participation (10 %), and an extra-credit assignment (worth up to 3%). The objective is to really learn Latin: after this semester, you will be well-prepared to take the intermediate-level courses, and also to start reading independently with the help of a dictionary and commentaries. As for the extra credit project - - we can discuss as a class what we want this to be.

Course activities:

We will divide class time between discussing grammar and reading Wheelock’s exercitationes and sententiae, as well as longer passages (both from Wheelock, and outside it). I am happy to collect and revise your homework, or to discuss it during office hours, but I will not require you to hand it in. Nevertheless, as a courtesy to your classmates, it is important that you spend some time preparing the homework before we look at in class. Also, your performance on the exams and quizzes will depend on keeping up with the homework. We will have a quiz every Wednesday.
